The colonies are founded, but they do not flourish Frenchmen do not seek them except as officials or a few stray. tradesmento cater for them; the trade is done by foreigners, and the great natural resources are for the most part left undeveloped, or are exploited by the aid of foreign capital and foreign enterprise. The feverish eagerness of French militarists to make new conquests is in marked contrast with the invincible indisposition of French capitalists and traders to utilise the open ings thus secured to them. In almost every French colony this is the case. Our French friends are loth to admit the fact that they are not a colonising race. They fondly point to Canada, where thrive to-day a million and a half of industrious people of from Amoy French descent. But one swallow does not make a summer, and the circumstances there were exceptional, as were the times when that colony was formed and subsequently flourished under the British flag.

The truth is that the French are a home change loring and a home-keeping race. Prince HENRI of ORGEANS, who is an ardent advocate of French colonial expansion and of a spirited commercial policy, has to admit that there is a lack of energy on the part of his countrymen if not of indifference. In giving the result of his observations of French trade in Siam in his new book be says that French commerce on the Menan is practically nil, and goes on to make the following pithy remarks - One is glad to perceive a tricoloured flag occasionally, but I would prefer for my part a little less flag and a little more trade of which there is none at all, or very little. French Bank established at Pa Nam Po was closed two years ago, and even in Bangkok I see only one French shop, provided especially with scenta toilet "objects, and articles de Paris." In his concluding remarks on the trade of Tunkin be reminds French merchants that while French imports into Tonkin amount to only the question of the reduction of capital. [20] £480,000 for twelve million inhabitants, the direct imports of England into Burmah were, even in 1884, £2,840,000 for about four and a half million people, and that from 1891-92 the foreign trade of Burmah was two hundred and fifty million rupeoa.
